I am glad the new features integrate well into the workflow and we can use where needed. My concern is the performance changes and lack of UI enhancements.

Overall, more can be done to make the UI seem so "user friendly" (like a better warn answering application). The increase in performance has seemed to be a decrease in overall user experience. Being a photographer, I am easily annoyed when my application can't keep up with me.

Imaging software works best when it is able to provide feedback without hindering its own workflow. The ability to easily select candidate photos, apply effects to a locked group, and immediately see "a preview" of my work is where the benefits of the software really come in to play. Wasting time trying to do multiple selections, apply duplicates, add new layers, re-import files, or apply filters as I am able to through a tool like lightroom is no longer have a valid argument for me as a user. Altering the safeties, modifying the internal tables, or changing a filter's settings is very important to be able to actually USE my software without it just becoming a hindrance.

If I had to choose between being able to use the new tools but having to deal with the performance hit or keeping the UI the same, I'll take it every time. We are all aware that our impatience can be easily exploited (delete filters? Why not add a new one?), and changing the UI every time we want to update Lightroom is not something I would recommend to my users.

I still would like to see a major revamp/change of the UI though. I haven't really heard anything on this topic in a while, and it seems to feel like it is at a standstill for the LR community. Things have been going great since 4.5, and I think the community would be able to handle a UI revamp if one was available.

The next version of Lightroom would probably need to be more than a minor upgrade. I don't think we should have to make some drastic changes every time we as a community want to throw in a feature that is available in ICC profiles that we know is promised to us later. Perhaps they could be promised this with ISO profiling being the next big thing in Lightroom.

We are not asking for things that are unreasonable or unachievable.

Good Luck to the team for the new version.

Smart Objects are a bit like layers, they're an even higher level of control, but they often automate the tedious tasks of selections, masks, and smart adjustments. By attaching a Smart Object to a layer, the software can automate those repetitive tasks. And the bonus is that it memorizes how the Smart Object was applied to the layer, so it's ready to use that same Smart Object again for additional tasks you may need to do. One of the main components of Adobe Photoshop is the Photoshop Camera Raw plug-in. First of all, this is an essential plug-in which enables raw photo editing in
